

The X-Stream Angler Program

The X-Stream Angler program was developed to help anglers and others become familiar with the many streams where instream flow water rights have been secured and how they help maintain our fisheries, economy, and high quality of life.

What are instream flow water rights?

An instream flow WATER RIGHT is a tool for legally protecting water in streams for the benefit of fish. Instream flow water rights are one way the Game and Fish Department manages habitat to maintain or improve important fisheries for the citizens of Wyoming. Water is owned by all the people of the state, so it makes sense that some water in some streams is permanently dedicated to the enjoyment of all the state's citizens.

Where are instream flow water rights?

Over 120 streams across Wyoming have instream flow water rights. Instream flow segments are on most of the state’s best fishing streams as well as on many streams with native cutthroat trout. Nearly all instream flow segments are on lands with some public ownership.

To learn more about the fisheries and instream flow recommendations for the segments that you can fish to qualify as an X-Stream Angler, visit <http://wgfd.wyo.gov/InstreamFlow>.

To become an X-Stream Angler:

- Fish in at least three instream flow segments. Some streams have more than one instream flow segment and each one can count toward your total. Entries must be for instream flow segments visited after January 1, 2012.
- Take a photo of each stream fished. Photo must include the stream!
- Fill out the application below and submit with photos via mail, email, or online. Details on back page.

X-Stream Anglers receive a high quality twill cap with the program logo.
